CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION AND SUGGESTION

This chapter contains conclusions of research findings and suggestions regarding this research.

A. Conclusion

As we know from the data above, we can see the difficulties faced by students in reading and understanding news item text, namely in understanding the generic text structure of news item text, having difficulty understanding vocabulary, finding it difficult to determine the main idea, determining detailed information, look for references, and find the main idea and purpose of the text.

Next, there are factors that influence students, such as student background and environment. Students are lazy about reading long sections of text, making it difficult for them to find answers or get information from the text. Students are lazy about studying at home, there is a lack of support for learning English from family or teachers, and also influence from friends at school. From this, it is clear that it can influence and even be very important in helping students' mastery process in understanding news texts.

B. Suggestion

For teachers, researchers suggest that in learning news texts teachers can teach and guide students to improve their skills in identifying topics, finding main ideas, finding supporting ideas, making conclusions, and identifying the purpose of the news. This indicator is very necessary in understanding all types of news texts provided. Teachers can give students lots of practice or provide some tips for identifying these indicators when reading a news text. Teachers can also provide more interesting and interactive learning so that students are more interested in learning English.

For students, it is hoped that they will always be active in studying, continue to respect the learning methods used by teachers, continue to learn to understand vocabulary little by little, and always familiarize themselves with English, for example through music or films. This is to support students' enthusiasm for learning English.

For future researchers, it is hoped that they will be able to obtain important things from this research. So that it can help development in future learning.